

The Bloomfield Citizen.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1886.

As will be seen by consulting our advertising columns, the "Young People's Evening" of the Old Church intend repeating the Smith Family. As we stated at the time the performance of this extravaganza was the most complete and enjoyable musical entertainment we ever attended in Bloomfield. There should be no difficulty in selling the "house" twice over.

A prominent member of the "third party" was discovered before election circulating the story that Mr. Underhill just after the convention went to a saloon and "set up" the drinks for the boys. This was shown to be absolutely untrue by a Republican who had taken pains to investigate the matter. As a justification the "circulator" said he had heard so, anyway. Is it becoming in men of the party of high moral ideas to actively engage in giving currency to what they believe to be a damaging story, with no evidence of its truth? The circulation of damaging lies is both illegal and immoral, and ignorance of the truth does not excuse either in law or morals.

There is a report current, having what foundation in fact we know not, that a new hotel is to be erected in the Spring upon the site of Archdeacon's hotel at the Centre.

There are many reasons why this project should be discouraged, chief among which are the following: That it is not needed, the present hotel accommodation being ample for all present and prospective wants. That if erected it can only result in adding one more place for the sale of liquor to the already excessive number in this town. That the former hotel on that site had anything but a savory reputation, and there is no desire on the part of any to see a successor arise at this day. There should be no uncertain expression of public opinion on this subject.

Some Reflections.

In spite of some personal dissatisfaction with the candidates, in spite of Mr. Ahlborn's beer keg openly on tap, in spite of the opposition of the low grog-shop and the rum-soaked, in spite of the malice and hatred and low political methods of some of the political prohibitionists, in spite of the attempt to befool the Republican Labor vote, the Republicans of Bloomfield have fought a hard fight and reaped a brilliant victory.

Republican voters of all shades upon sober thought decided that their leaders were in the main in the right, and that amid the clash and confusion of recent opinion, the safety of the State lay in the brains of the Republican party. There were differences of belief that had to be tempered, there were personal preferences that had to be given up, there were private policies that had to yield to the general view, but every sacrifice that the occasion demanded was cheerfully made, and there was not a single skulker to be found in the ranks.

The manly way in which some of our leaders put aside all thought of old blows and worked good naturedly with those who had dealt them, was worthy of all praise; and best of all, the same spirit pervaded all sections. This promises that in the coming fight, the members of the party will stand together, and the nominee fairly chosen in the primary will be loyally supported at the polls. We shall settle all little family differences ourselves hereafter, and not call in some Democrat or Prohibition monkey to eat up our cheese.

Much of the very gratifying result in Bloomfield is due to the vigilance and activity of our campaign executive committee. The time was short but the work most effective.

That Democratic side-show, the Prohibition party, retires from the fight badly damaged, by unexpectedly and at the last moment coming into forcible contact with the "fourth party" accommodation given in the opposite direction. The prohibitionists thought they had exhausted the supply of cranks, but some escaped their vigilance. Hence these fears.

The prohibitionists (that is, the bosses) never expected to carry anything themselves, but they did hope to smash the Republican party. Their attempt was a dismal failure. The temperance men acted on the advice of their friends and dared to do right. That is all.

To take no higher point of view than that of expediency, one thing seems clear—that the matter of the liquor traffic should at once be fearlessly taken up, and settled in a statesmanlike manner. As long as it remains unsettled it will remain to plague us. Many temperance people do not trust the Republican party, and many in the liquor trade are afraid of us. Between the two we are in constant danger. A high license law, such as that of some Western States, once carried, as it certainly could be, would at once command the support of all classes save a few cranks and rum harpies.

There are thousands of our best citizens who would vote for and sustain a law which would abolish the low crime-breeding grogery, but would oppose Prohibition, holding that a respectable man has a right to go to a respectable place and get a respectable drink.

After one year's trial moderate drinkers, and total abstainers and liquor dealers of the better sort would be found enforcing the high license laws.

What could a "labor" party have done for the labor interest this last quarter of a century that the Republican party has not done? Who has had more to say in its management than the laboring man?

Interviewing.

Mr. Julian Hawthorne has lately introduced a new phase into an old subject. As his father's son he visited his father's old friend, James Russell Lowell, and having subjected Mr. Lowell to an unsuspected "interview" instead of a supposed private conversation, he thereupon turned—shall we say an honest?—penny, by publishing the same. Mr. Lowell indignantly exposed the affair and Mr. Hawthorne immediately fell back upon the ancient line of defense: that the late minister to England was a public man and that the whole proceeding was of the nature of public business as conducted by American journalists.

But does journalism necessarily abrogate gentility? Does the business of catering to the nostrils of news-smellers invalidate the sacredness of hospitable frankness? Shall the journalist first, last, and all the time, be ready to tell again his new thing irrespective of the methods by which he has obtained it?

No one now can read any great American journal without being struck by the preeminence given in it to chatter and gossip, "to talk of the street," to current snap interviews and to similar bits of froth and folly. So long as these are harmless, and only touch the foibles, the vanities and the "fads" of our fellowmen and women, we all enjoy them. It is different when dishonest means are used to get them and when they are cast forth to the world to the annoyance and disgust of their victims.

Besides, there is an infinite mischief in this sort of space-filling, altogether apart from its empty pomp and sounding nothingness. No plan is more often employed to float unworthy schemes or to advertise clap-trap of all sorts. We ask ourselves how much the interviewer pockets from the interview as well as from his regular profession. "Black mail" may scarcely be the name for it—but who can doubt that Mr. Hawthorne entered and left Mr. Lowell's home on the footing of personal friendship and by this fact alone was able to get the information which he converted into so much sortid bread-and-butter? And who can doubt that Mr. Lowell, had he suspected the trap, would have halted the alleged "interviewer" and forced a promise from him to respect the privacy of a conversation which was never intended for the press?

It comes to this, that the "interviewer" has brought exceedingly vicious practices into literary circles. Mr. Hawthorne has now chosen to subordinate his character as a gentleman to his profession as a scribe. For this Mr. Lowell has publicly exposed him in the plainest terms. But this does not alter the drift of the times in which we live and it will not prevent politicians, actors, schemers and plotters of every kind sending out for well-selected interviewers—as we might call for a boot-black or a barber—to whom they say in Col. Mapleson's airy manner "Yes, dear boy, I'll tell you all about it"—And so forth, and so on.
